DESPERATE ENCOUNTER. A Cutting Scrape Between Two River Pilots.

Between ten and eleven o'clock yesterday morning, two well-known river pilots, named Jim Dougherty and Angelo McBride, had one of the most desperate encounters that has ever taken place in this city, and which came near terminating in the death of Dougherty. The row is said to have grown out of an old difficulty, that the parties engaged in over a year ago, and which Dougherty has been nursing since the time the trouble first began. The particulars of the fuss yesterday, as told us by parties who witnessed the fight, are that Dougherty, McBride and another pilot, named Tom. Seymour, were sitting on some barrels near the Delmonico saloon, talking, when Dougherty, in reply to a remark made by Seymour, in regard to his paying visits to certain persons who did not care about seeing him, said: "Yes, I know, There are a good many people in this town who don't like me, who are always talking about me, and I'll make some of them swallow their words before I'm done with them yet." He then turned to McBride and said

"You have been talking about me, and I want to know what you did it for?" Me-Bride answered: "I have not said any-high words, when Dougherty said: "You are a lying son of a boh," and reached out his hand to seize McBride, who stepped back, thus evading him, don't wan't anything to do with you;' but Doughtery did not heed the warning. and followed McBride as he walked backward, finally grabbing hold of his coat collar, and striking him on the head, just above the forehead. This was the signal for the fight to begin in carnest. McBride, who had a small pocket-knife in his hand while the conversation had been progressing, thrust it at the neck of his antagonist, striking him just below the ear, and drew the knife around until it had reached the middle of the chin.

laying the flesh back as the knife went,

making a horrible and sickening sight to look at.

This would alone would have been sufficient to have conquered almost any man, bu, Dougherty did not place any stain upon his character as a desperate whose temper is none of the best when proused, was now fully awake to the work before blue, and again made wicked lunge at his man, this time the knite entering the right side of Dougherty's lower jaw, inflicting a deep and ugly wound three inches long; but this etc., also Moss and Chenille, and pie even did not deter him from still fighting nic and ladies' Traveling Baskets-the like a demon. The blood was pouring from the wounded man's neck and tace in perfect streams, and the men who were in close proximity to the combatants stood with blanched cheeks and falling hearts, none being willing to risk their lives in making an attempt to seperate them. Again Dougherty made an attempt to get at McBride, and again he received the knife blade, this time in the stomach.

By this time, a large crowd had gathred around the spot, but none made a move toward stopping the desperate encounter except Chief of Police McHale, who caught Dougherty just in time to save him from another thrust of the knife, which McBride was about to administer to him. Dougherty was placed in the hands of a couple of gentlemen who took him to the office of Dr. Wardner, where his wounds were dressed, while Chief McHale took McBride in charge, Dr. Wardner in his examination of the wounds of Dougherty, found hone of them to be dangerous, though the one in the stomach is said to be two inches deep and nearly an inch long. Those on the face and neck are ugly looking cuts, the lower one being nearly five, and the upper one three linehes long, and both pretty deep, but neither is said to be dangerous, though very ugly wounds. McBride declares that he did not want to have any words with Dougherty, and that he walked backward at least fifty teet, in order to get a chance to turn and run away, knowing full well that it Dougherty succeeded in getting hold of him, he would beat him terribly, Dougherty being a much larger man, and a men also who would have no mercy, provided he once got hold of him. Dougherty is now at the Planter's House, confined to his room, and McBride is in the county jail, awaiting a hearing, which it is thought will take place to-day, before Indge Bross,

The Age of Discovery

W. Winter, the artist, is about to present to the citizens of Cairo a new pleture, with all the coloring of real life. The means of working these charming and life-like pictures will not be withheld from the public. The modus operand is as follows: On the right hand side of the camera is attached a mill which contains the prismatic colors in a pulverized state. As the colors pass into the camera they are received by a fun wheel which keeps the atoms in motion. The photographic plate, while wet, is then placed in the camera-the sitter being in position. The handle of the mill is gently turned. The cap of ube is removed, the image of the sitter begins to form while passing through the colored atmosphere, the particles of dust falling where they properly belong When, Presto! you have a beautiful pie
